The Heart Responds

Jesus' message was not just proclaimed. It was heard and understood and retold to a reporter (Luke) before it went down on paper. In the business of communication, the best way to make sure something will be understood is to have it fed back from somebody who has heard and understood it.

Through the agency of his disciples, Jesus got across to Luke his love for people—all sorts of people.

Note the people Luke mentions. He talks about men and women, old and young, children and even babies. He talks about fathers, mothers, sons, daughters, brothers, sisters. He refers to engaged people, a bridegroom, husbands, wives, mothers-in-law, daughters-in-law. He mentions the barren, the divorced, and the adulterous. There are neighbors, relatives, and friends.

And what a variety of occupations Jesus moves among. Luke speaks of shepherds, farmers, and their laborers, pig breeders, and fishermen. There are soldiers and their officers, guards, and police. There are those who make their living as thieves, prostitutes, and beggars. He speaks of doctors, bankers, managers, tax collectors, and other officials. There are innkeepers, water carriers, housewives, builders, teachers, and pupils, masters and slaves, landowners and their tenants, merchants and servants, priests and Levites, elders and teachers of the law. All these people grace Luke's pages. Kings, governors, rulers and judges are not missing; even the party men are there, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Herodians.

Luke also describes the conditions people were in. They were hungry people, gluttons, and drunkards. There were the humble and the proud, the poor and the rich, the ignorant and the learned. There were wicked people, respectable people, greedy people. Some were blind, lame, crippled, deaf, demon possessed, or paralyzed. There were debtors, lepers, people with torn clothes, cheaters, and hypocrites. There were wise and foolish, dishonest and violent. They laughed and they cried, both the evil and the good. And there were Greeks and Romans, Jews and Samaritans, Galileans and countrymen, citizens and foreigners. Some were hated, some were in prison, some were oppressed and ill-treated, some were cursed by others and heartbroken. These were the people Luke registered as coming to Jesus from one town after another.

How did Jesus see these people? He tells us in the parable of the sower (Luke 8:5-15). They all fit into four categories of soil that he mentions.
